WORK IN PROGRESS

▷ School Access and City Structure

Job Market Paper

The location choices of households with kids connect housing, labor, and school markets. These connections bear consequences for policies tackling inequality in access to opportunities. In this paper, I develop a quantitative spatial model that incorporates school choice to study the effects of these connections. Parents with different skills select their residence by balancing access to schools and employment, choose a school considering its endogenous peer composition, and compete with childless households for houses and jobs. I use data from Madrid on school admissions and workers' commuting trips to estimate preferences for schools and workplaces. Combining households' location data with exogenous variation from the city's historical expansion, I estimate neighborhood preferences separately from endogenous school quality. I find that access to schools influences residential and job choices, decreasing segregation across parents by 15% and shifting workers towards productive areas. However, the reaction of non-parents counteracts these effects. Work commuting costs concentrate skilled households in central locations, increasing school quality differences for students from high and low-skill families by 2.6% through peer effects. Finally, I show that interactions between schools and the labor market shape the consequences of work-from-home and the results of school transportation policies.
