Job Market Paper

To understand how schools shape the city structure, this paper develops a quantitative spatial model that includes school choice. Parents pick a residence balancing access to schools and skill-specific jobs, choose a school considering its endogenous peer composition, and compete with childless households for houses and jobs. The equilibrium features interactions between schools and the labor market through households' residential choices. I estimate the model with data from Madrid on the quasi-universe of school applications and admissions, workers' commuting trips by skill, and the location, composition, and education of every household in the city. Schools influence parental residential and job choices, but non-parents reacting to local competition reduce by 40% the impact of schools on house prices and the distribution of workers. Commuting costs concentrate skilled workers in productive locations, but as they enroll their kids close by, peer effects in schools amplify by almost three times the impact of the labor market on the distribution of students. These cross-market interactions significantly affect the outcome of policies increasing school choice and the city-wide consequences of work-from-home.
